Summary

My career has taken a few turns, but there's been one consistent theme throughout: people. After business school, I spent two years in the corporate world, followed by four years as a therapist. I then returned to corporate life for more than 17 years, working in marketing strategy, business intelligence, analytics, organizational performance, and change management. After that corporate chapter, I returned once again to people-focused work through therapy and professional coaching. Today, I'm a small business operator, entrepreneur, and AI Generalist in training. What ties all of that together for me is a simple belief: businesses work better when the people inside them—and the customers they serve—are treated as the starting point. That means hiring and developing the right people, building strong teams, staying close to the customer, and creating systems that are useful, understandable, and actually help people do better work. Over the past five years, I've moved into hands-on small business management and entrepreneurship, working across boating, marine retail, hospitality, and now e-commerce. I'm also increasingly focused on practical AI for small business—especially where AI can make work easier, improve decision-making, strengthen marketing and customer experience, and help small teams do more without losing the human side of the business. I'm interested in connecting with small business owners, entrepreneurs, and AI professionals who are thinking about the same questions: how do we use better tools, better systems, and better leadership to build better businesses?
